

Documentary Highlights Adventist Education's Holistic Approach

Adventist News Network

Isai Bautista couldn't read a word – "nada," he says – when he transferred to the Bronx-Manhattan Seventh-day Adventist School in the third grade. Now he's graduating from eighth grade with honors, thanks, in part, to a dedicated teacher who worked with him every day after school... The Bronx-Manhattan Adventist School is one of eight Adventist schools across North America that independent filmmaker Martin Doblmeier profiles in his latest documentary, "The Blueprint: The Story of Adventist Education," now available on DVD.

"The blueprint" can be traced back to Adventist Church co-founder Ellen G. White, who, in the mid-19th century, introduced the concept of holistic education – mental, physical, social and spiritual health coupled with intellectual growth and service to humanity. Today, the Adventist Church operates the second largest faith-based school system in the world.

On location in Holbrook, Arizona, Doblmeier explores how the Holbrook Indian School – an Adventist boarding school near the Navaho Indian reservation – teaches students to find value and self-worth in their identity as Native Americans and children of God....

At schools from Holbrook to the Columbine Christian School in Durango, Colorado, students share certain characteristics that correlate with high achievement, the documentary reveals – these traits include reading for pleasure, having positive relationships and getting good nutrition and adequate sleep. Students also identify themselves as spiritual... Continue reading online at RockwoodAdventist.com.
